THE CENTENARY OF GAS.

Will Another Hundred Years Superseds It

Among the many anniversaries which are being celebrated this year is the centenary of the invention of gas as an illuminant, says the New York Tribone. It was in 1792 that William Murdock first lighted up his humble home at Redruth, in duchy of Cornwall, by means of coal gas made in an iron kettle, into which be inserted a rough iron tube. It was not until six years later that the invention was developed on a large scale, when Murdock was employed to establish a gas-lighting apparatus at the great Soho foundry at Birmingham. In 1803 the Lyceum theater in London was first lighted by gas, and in 1816 the gas lamps which had been used to illuminate Piccadilly since 1807 became com-mon throughout London. It was at this time, too, that David Melville, of Newport, R. I., first adapted gas, for the manufacture of which he had se-cured a putent in 1896, to the Beaver Tail lighthouse, and it has since be-come one of the principal illuminants used in those watch towers which, in imitation of the ancient phares, ar scattered all over the globe for th guidance and protection of ships and

It is doubtful whether a hundred years hence, on the occasion of the bi-centenary of the invention of gas, the latter will still retain the commanding position which it now occupies as an illuminant. On every side signs increase which presage that the age of electricity is at hand-that age which is far more likely to revolutionize the civilization of the world than any of its producessors. Gas will probably be prolecessors. Gas will probably be gradinally ferced into a back seat and its use confined to stoves and fire-olaces, which find such favor among the small households of crowded cities It will be entitled, however, to the grateful remembrance of man as a powerful factor in the development of his civilization and progress during the last one hundred years. It has contribated, moreover, to his enlightenment as well as to his comfort, and has done ranch to increase the broad and deep gulf which separates humanity of the incteenth century from mankind of the dark ages.

ANCIENT DICE THROWING.

A Favorite Form of Gambling Among the Old Romans.

The number of dice used was three, being marked with a minimum of one and a maximum of six spots. The most fortunate throw called venerous by Cicero (de Divin., L., 13.) and basiliens by Plautus, (Curenlic, II. 3, 79,) was when the dice showed three s, or eighteen spots. The progress of the game was marked on the board by the movement of the men (latrunculi) backward and forward The gravity of the losses accended naturally upon the amount of money at stake and the fines that were paid when the dice showed one or more

It is difficult to explain what skill had to do with such a game, still Isi-dores describes how inveterate gamband ling the unit. I suspect that the n cent, and that a beavy particle of lead was parliags concealed on the side of the unit. In a gradito at Pompetian horest clayer congratulates bimself for baying gained a good sum of money without frand. Pinetus dwells so retimes on these dishonest practices, to avoid which several instruments were invented from time to time, on he as the born (pyxis owner) not the fittilis. It seems, however, that these instruments did not given a faithful their purpose. A in the shape of a tower, with a spiral staircase inside and a fernel on the top. The dice shaken first in the horn or in the fritillus, were thrown late the funnel and rolled down the spira staircase will they landed on the table. Such precautions rendered cheating almost impossible.—Lanciani, in North American Review.

He Was the Only Ellmarnock Man. How many of the best and ruclest Scotch stories are connected with the sturdy old town of Ki marnock! Perhaps the most humorous of any, illus-trating as it does the ingrained concert and self-satisfaction of the Caledonian character, may be here recalled. A drunken weaver who had stumbled into the old "kirkyard" of Kilmarnock, and there fallen down over a grave, was roused from his Scottish slumbers in the dim light of the breaking dawn, by the horn of the mail coach as it rattled past. Up rose the bemazed Tammas at the sound. What awful voice was that? Surely it could be nothing less than the sound of the last trump; and he-was he alone of all the occupants of the kirkyard a fit person to respond? Slowlymprearing himself, and beholding no other spirits rising from the surrounding tombs (according to his view), "Hech, sirs," he cried aloud, his soul stirred within him to find that be
